Essay Structure

Topic: Should Attendance Be Mandatory for University Students?

Thesis Statement: I strongly believe that Attendance should not be mandatory for university students because mandatory attendance limits students' freedom, may create difficulties for students with other responsibilities, and does not necessarily guarantee effective learning.

Supporting Points/Plan of Development:
i) Limit students' freedom and independence
ii) Create difficulties for students with other responsibilities
iii) Do not necessarily guarantee effective learning
iv) Refutation the opposing argument

Topic Sentence of the First Supporting Paragraph:
Firstly, mandatory attendance limits university students' freedom to manage their own time and learning.

Topic Sentence of the Second Supporting Paragraph:
Secondly, strict attendance requirements can create difficulties for students who have part-time jobs, family responsibilities, or other academic commitments.

Topic Sentence of the Third Supporting Paragraph:
Finally, attending every class does not necessarily guarantee effective learning because students can learn through self-study, recorded lectures, and other academic resources.

Refutation/Counterargument:
Some people argue that mandatory attendance improves academic performance and classroom participation. However, motivated students can remain academically engaged without being required to attend every class.

Concluding Sentence:
In conclusion, attendance should not be mandatory for university students because it limits their freedom, creates difficulties for students with other responsibilities, and does not necessarily guarantee effective learning.

Should Attendance Be Mandatory for University Students?

University students are generally expected to take responsibility for their own education and academic progress. While regular attendance can be helpful, requiring students to attend every class may not always be necessary. Attendance should not be mandatory for university students because mandatory attendance limits students' freedom, may create difficulties for students with other responsibilities, and does not necessarily guarantee effective learning.

Firstly, mandatory attendance limits university students' freedom to manage their own time and learning. University students are mature enough to decide how they can learn most effectively. Some students may prefer to study independently using textbooks, online resources, or lecture materials. Giving students more control over their schedules can help them develop independence and responsibility.

Secondly, strict attendance requirements can create difficulties for students who have part-time jobs, family responsibilities, or other academic commitments. Some students may need to work to support their education, while others may have responsibilities outside the university. If attendance is strictly compulsory, these students may struggle to balance their academic and personal responsibilities.

Finally, attending every class does not necessarily guarantee effective learning. A student may attend a class physically but remain uninterested or fail to understand the lesson. On the other hand, students who miss a class may study the material independently and understand it well. Therefore, academic performance should be evaluated through students' learning, assignments, examinations, and participation rather than attendance alone.

Some people argue that mandatory attendance improves academic performance and classroom participation. However, motivated students can remain academically engaged without being required to attend every class. Universities can encourage attendance by making classes interactive and valuable instead of relying only on strict attendance requirements.

In conclusion, attendance should not be mandatory for university students because it limits their freedom, creates difficulties for students with other responsibilities, and does not necessarily guarantee effective learning. Universities should encourage regular attendance while giving students reasonable freedom to manage their own learning.